Technically Trained Leaders Are Needed

Voters may not be able to decide intelligently on ballot measures bearing on space project issues unless they get help from scientists, John W. Luhring, chairman of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce aerospace committee, warned this week.

Luhring, addressing graduates of Northrop Institute of Technology, cited a growing need for technically trained persons in business and government positions.

Voters are being asked to make "extremely sophisticated decisions," said Luhring, bearing on such subjects as the RS-70 manned bomber, the Apollo moon program, and atomic testing in the atmosphere.

HE ADDED that this "suggests the technically trained person has a duty to his fellow citizens to pass on at least a part of what he has learned." Luhring, speaking to 101 members of the summer class, said the new dimension calls for a break with the past. Speaking of the traditional demand for lawyers in leadership positions, he added, "The lawyer has been in demand because his training led him to proficiency in orderly thought processes and the exercise of generally good judgment. Surely the training in engineering and the sciences is based on somewhat the same skills."
